Day two at the local City Hall, where I've noticed that the only demographic group that consistently does not say hello or acknowledge my presence is white males. I mentioned this to two Arab-speaking women who had sat down beside me and started to speak with me. This led to a lengthy conversation (note all the gold stitches!) about white male behaviour in public, white supremacy and how important it is to school children in power dynamics and compassionate behaviour. Earlier in the day a young girl came up to me while her mother was waiting in line. She was delighted with the colours, the feel of the silk and wanted to know what the object would become. I asked her what she thought it could become. Here are her answers in the order she mentioned: 1) a scarf, 2) a table mat, 3) a magic carpet. I particularly like the third option!

Valéry Grancher As a white male also, in my country to do not talk to woman you don't know is to be polite and galant, because you have to pay respect to them and let them in peace ! 😊
